The Hill reported. FDA Commissioner Scott Gottlieb said: "Animal studies are not required by law to demonstrate safety or effectiveness, and we do not believe that animal studies would be useful for new drugs or biologics, or any new class of active pharmaceutical ingredients or biological products." US lawmakers had earlier passed legislation for animal studies to be banned. The US Drug Administration (FDA) requires drug makers to show their medicines are safe and effective before they can get on the market. It has been criticized for approving drugs without ensuring they are safe for human use. In 2012, the FDA and drug makers failed to secure proper levels of treatment for infants born with a serious and often fatal bleeding disorder. The lifesaving drug, Factor VIII concentrate, was available after production on a limited basis and was not given as the first-line treatment for the condition. The bill comes after New York University graduate student Julia Bond died in March after her efforts to draw blood for a study had been stopped by the Waltham, Massachusetts-based company Baxter. The industry-funded study on Factor VIII concentrate was conducted in 2005. Baxter said that an internal review of the study found it was performed at levels of safety that were "not intended or reasonable" in a human.[Peritoneal dialysis: comparison between continuous ambulatory peritoneal dialysis and automated peritoneal dialysis].
